Teens' video captures teachers' influence through the years

More than 60 years ago, Mary G. Bailey taught art to Punchard High students, tucked in a classroom on the lower floor of Andover's high school off Whittier Court.

Filming a documentary about Andover's teachers, Andover High students found the teacher, now 88 years old, still sharing her skills. She was teaching art to senior citizens in the very same room, now a part of Andover Senior Center.

"I've got a lot of respect for her," Adam Martin, 16, a junior at Andover High said. "The Senior Center was just the best... and the thing I liked about (Ms. Bailey) was that she said, 'What you paint is what's inside.' She really puts you at ease."

Ms. Bailey was only one of the special discoveries that Adam and other members of the Andover High Video Club uncovered while creating a tribute to Andover's teachers.

"In the spirit of the 350th anniversary, we wanted to work on something positive for the town," club adviser Harry J. Durso said.

Their program, "Listen Live," a cable program honoring Andover's teachers, is Andover High senior Laura A. Selima, 16, daughter of Barbara and Walter Selima of Andover.

Interviewing Andover High senior Joshua A. Hatch for "Listen Live," a cable program honoring Andover's teachers, is Andover High junior Laura A. Selima, 16, daughter of Barbara and Walter Selima of Andover.

"In the spirit of the 350th anniversary, we wanted to work on something positive for the town," club adviser Harry J. Durso said.

Their program, "Listen Live," will premiere tomorrow 7 to 9 p.m. on cable channel 12. The program will feature candid, taped segments with Andover residents speaking about how the teachers of Andover touched their lives. There will also be a live, call-in portion of the show.

"It's making people aware of the good teachers in Andover's public schools," said junior Laura A. Selima, 16. "It's good we're talking about this. It lets people know how good Andover schools are, and I'm really psyched to do this project."

The students handled all the interviews, camera work and editing. They also endured the added complication of having no studio.

Andover High is undergoing a $29 million renovation project. The school's studio has been off limits because of construction all year long, and television courses have not been held.

"I am just proud of these kids putting in this kind of quality time with the absence of a television production course," Mr. Durso said. "I'm extra proud, we all are, of the students working on this project."
